THE NORTH AMERICAN

LINCOLN CENTENNIAL NUMBER

MAGAZINE (Sixth) SECTION

PHILADELPHIA, SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1909

(Copyright, 1909, by The North American Co.)

136th Year

1809 1909

ADDRESS ON THE BATTLE-FIELD OF GETTYSBURG, NOVEMBER 19, 1863.

FOURSCORE and seven years ago our fathers brought forth upon this continent a new nation, conceived in Liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle-field of that war. We are met to dedicate a portion of it as the final resting-place of those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it far above our power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work that they have thus far so nobly carried on. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to the cause for which they here gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that the dead shall not have died in vain—that the nation shall, under God, have a new birth of freedom, and that the government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

1,2009,085.20939

THE AMETHYST CROSS

COPYRIGHTED 1909 BY THE NORTH AMERICAN CO.

Two Girls and Their Troubles Over One Man

by W. Fergus Hume

AUTHOR OF "THE MYSTERY OF A HANSOM CAB" AND OTHER NOTED DETECTIVE STORIES.

SYNOPSIS: George Walker, a poor but well-born young Englishman, falls in love with Leslie Hale, and in token of their engagement receives from her an amethyst cross of mysterious origin. Her father is terribly angered when he finds the lass given it away, and declares the engagement must be broken unless the recovered it. Walker is waylaid, and the cross is taken from his room. Hale refuses consent to the marriage unless he recovered it. And his mother also manifests unyielding opposition to the match.

While giving a house party at his Henley mansion, Tait, a stock broker, whose niece, Maud Ellis, is in love with George Walker, is robbed of valuable jewels.

(CONTINUED FROM LAST SUNDAY.)

CHAPTER VIII

Disgraced.

THERE was very little sleep for any one during the remaining hours of darkness, and after breakfast—an unusually dismal meal—the guests one and all showed a desire to get away from their host.

Mr. Tait certainly was not unhappy, since he had achieved a great a loss and provoked the ire of his guests, yet he did not behave a gentleman, he could not control his temper, and made blunders at a specially disagreeable date that even he wanted to leave forthwith. But until the police had made inquiries, it was impossible for either man or woman to depart without leave of the magnate.

The original plot, whether made by the man, were unknown, and the ladies scattered. But no longer the Henley mansion was a place of pleasant diversion, upon which account the guests were all anxious to depart.

The police duly arrived, and searched the gardens and the premises, but no trace could they find of the thieves. George stuck persistently to his story, which, as he was a gentleman, the police had to accept. Mr. Tait was in a fearful rage, and said to the chief, "And I was the fool enough—this week exchequer—which made Mr. Walker's fortune, and I lend him the money to pay his debts and set him up in business."

"What has my being a partner to do with your losses?" asked George, who was in a fearful rage.

"Everything, sir, everything," said Tait, with his little pig eyes. "My losses are worth £10,000, he received—"

"Don't say it, sir, don't say it," interrupted his wife, and George, seeing that, for the realizing his employer's obligations, he had better leave the room.

"I have seen to it that he shall pay back every penny," said Tait, with a sneer, "and I shall be sure to watch the thieves, and I shall be sure to get back my money."

"Is Walker one of the people your conduct is suspicious," prompted his wife, with a sneer.

"I made nothing of the sort."

"Then you should be more careful, because after every one in the house knows it, you have made a fool of yourself before the servants."

"I don't care two pence for the servants without discipline—I have employed them, and I know what they are capable of, and I care for no people." "I was willing to pay for, and on hearing of the loss of the jewels, I said to myself, I will be even with the thieves, and I will be even with Walker."

"I tell you again that I don't excuse you," vociferated the lady, "and I don't excuse you for your behavior to George."

"Why, what have I done?"

"Do you think I have asked?"

"Perhaps you have, but I should like to know what I have done, so I should not have been in time to do the thing again."

"Do you do nothing else but insult people, and make a fool of yourself?" he asked Tait sharply. "If there is any one who is a fool, it is you, and I wish I had married a man who was a gentleman, instead of a vulgar, ill-bred, ill-mannered, ill-tempered, ill-natured, ill-conditioned, ill-everything, and I wish I had married a man who was a gentleman, I don't care how poor he was, so long as he was a gentleman." "Why, what do you mean?" he said, with a sneer. "Do you think I don't excuse you?"

LINCOLN AS SEEN BY THE MEN OF HIS TIME.

SIDELIGHTS ON HIS CHARACTER AND PRAISE FOR HIS WORTH.

IT IS when a man has completed his work, performed his sacrifices and answered the last roll-call that those who knew him are wont, in its true perspective, the value and measure of his life.

When Abraham Lincoln died and his name was enshrined in the book of the world's martyrs, those who had known him intimately as friends or in official association gave to the public word pictures of the great President as each one saw him. Although in some ways these conceptions differed, upon one point they were unanimous—all proclaimed him one of the most just, most humane, most kindly, most intrinsically honest men that ever lived.

"The measure of a man's life," declared Pinkerton, "is the well-spending of it, and not the length." Abraham Lincoln's life was snapped like a golden thread by a ruthless hand, yet all who knew him believed that he had fulfilled his destiny. They sang panegyrics over his flower-strewn grave at bier rarely been sung before over any man, and he who had been most criticised became most praised.

IN AFTER years, when the great figure of Lincoln towns above the nation's horizon, majestic, dignified, and time weaves its halo about one who was purely human, the word pictures of the men patched by the men of his time will grab additional value and interest.

They show us the man on he was; give us a glimpse into his heart; reveal to us his nature; his sentiments, his ambitions, his hopes, his humanity.

Perhaps no more fitting tribute can be paid to Lincoln, as for most men, after his death.

Lincoln's biographers have exhausted eloquence and anecdote in their endeavors to depict him with the adequate proportions of contemporary interest. The intimate conditions of two of them show how the mystery, which had partially veiled the great President from his contemporaries, emerged their under.

It was very doubtful whether Lincoln ever knew Dr. J. G. Holland went to Illinois and there devoted a long period to an exhaustive labor, among men who had known Lincoln, designed to elicit every detail that would perhaps have been lost to posterity.

The returns given by Dr. Holland is at once the most discriminate and most valuable that has been presented in any study of a historical figure, some seven million pounds of which have been sold.

The many, almost more than one score of himself to Lincoln, the man, the lawyer, the friend, the husband and father, the statesman, the President, the Christian, the Christian, the man and on the man.

Lincoln was the greatest man in America, he had an earnest of immortality.

Lincoln was a Christian, he was only a scholar of the will of God.

Lincoln was a man of great sympathy, a man who had the strongest personal attachments, he had an unfailing sympathy with the people, he was a man of great humanity.

He was a leader of the people, he was always led by the people.

* * * *

Mr. William H. Herndon, for twenty years Lincoln's law partner, has left a minute description of his partner's appearance—perhaps the best for its strict performance in detail.

"Mr. Lincoln was six feet four inches high," he says. "And when he left his home for Washington, he was 50 years old, in good health and no gray hairs, or but few, on his head. His face was ashy, ebony, raw boned; this through the tissue to the bone and narrow across the shoulders. Weight, when he left home, 180 net; usual weight was 175 pounds.

"His structure was loose and leathery; he had dark skin, dark hair and looked vere-attuck. The whole man, body and mind, was of gloomy, as if it needed sting. Physically he was a very powerful man, lifting with one arm and, in one hand, a barrel of water. When he walked, he moved ponderously, but firmly; his long arms and giant hands swung down by his sides, as if they were made to knock down anybody who was in opposition to his remarkable strength. He was a man of great muscle and little fat.

"His face was long and his nose, for was in an early age, he was a homely man, careless of his dress, or at least, careless of the fashion of his clothes, and yet, with his long arms and giant hands, his underwear dripped from him as he walked. He was a man of great nerve, and, in his prime, was a man of great vitality, through a perfect mental mass. He combined the mental and the physical and the moral.

"In debate he fearlessly grappled all his forces and overwhelmed his foe. He was a man of great will, and, when he was in his prime, he was a man of great endurance, of great vitality, of great

LINCOLN'S HAPPY HOURS AT HOME

Mrs. Lincoln

Lincoln and his family in the White House — From Etching in the Century Magazine

Clay Green, Springfield, Ill. where Lincoln lived after his marriage

His Whole-hearted Devotion to His Wife and Children

FROM the time when Abraham Lincoln was first nominated for the presidency there was never a day when he did not bring some story, usually false, regarding his domestic life.

The majority of the canards were derogatory of Mrs. Lincoln, and they ranged all the way from criticism of the manner in which she wore her clothes to the most persistent and venomous reports that she regularly betrayed her husband to the Federal government to the Confederate leaders.

Perhaps the most recurrent story, very much alive to-day, is the one that Lincoln never really loved his wife and the mother of his children. The circumstantial narrative of the celebrated romance with Ann Rutledge have been quoted as evidence indisputable that he could not have loved the woman he married.

It happens that, in personal memoirs still treasured among collections of Lincoln'ana, there exists ample evidence of the life actually lived by Lincoln in the family circle. Even much of distortion the facts have suffered, and how much of the domestic happiness a man may claim as his own. Abraham Lincoln's can be made apparent to those at least who do not ask of life that it shall vouchsafe to them the realization of every ideal formed by youth's first glow of love's vast aspirations.

FOR thirty years a slave, Elizabeth Keckley, her freedom purchased, betook herself to Washington, and, almost at once, embraced her vocation of becoming dressmaker to the wife of the President, Mrs. Lincoln. For four years she lived in the White House, and it was she for whom Mrs. Lincoln made her most memorable shock of the President's administration, the bereaved woman who based her claim to sympathy on the ground that she was—to be her substitute.

Mrs. Keckley, an ardent admirer of President Lincoln, is whom she could see no fault of her husband failing, was as staunch a friend as she was a loyal servant of his wife, to whom she discovered such faithfulness as only women cannot fail to see in women.

Mrs. Keckley stated that she had, from the lips of Mrs. Lincoln herself, the story of the real origin of the rivalry between Mr. Lincoln and Stephen A. Douglas, a rivalry which so grew in consequence that before it ended with Lincoln's nomination for the presidency it stopped the very destinies of the nation. Frankness of a kind Mrs. Lincoln and Mr. Henry Lincoln intimate friend at the time of his courtship of Mrs. Lincoln, she received her account of the proposal for her hand.

From childhood petted and indulged, pretty, clever Mary Todd had cherished a seething faith that she was destined to become the wife of the President of the United States.

TWO FAMOUS SUITORS

She became the belle of Springfield, in Illinois, in the day when the constitutional rule of the nation-wide rotation of office to the presidency was something far more vitally near to the manhood of the American than it is today; no may have felt he had a larger fraction of a chance in the chance than he has now.

Both Douglas and Lincoln were her suitors. Lincoln, the son of the people, was the man who, by his tact the man of position and breeding, obviously was the man who was the man who was the man who, by his tact the man of position and breeding, obviously was the man who was the man who was the man who, by his tact the man of position and breeding, obviously was the man who was the man who

ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S FIRST LOVE STORY

His first glimpse of Ann Rutledge on the Salem Tavern.

The was his companion at Spelling Bees.

Hours when Life was sweet to both.

How Beautiful Ann Rutledge Won His Heart and Died

GREAT souls love and suffer deeply.

Great tragedies lie buried in the hearts of great benefactors of mankind. Affections of the noblest men have ended often in sorrow; have been written in tears, and bound in the immortal book of pain.

Some say, had not Abraham Lincoln loss Ann Rutledge the country would not have had its "Great Emancipator", that Lincoln might not have become the greatest and most heroic figure of the nineteenth century.

Lincoln's love for this beautiful girl must take its place among the great romances of history; the great passion of his life, which has in all the element of Greek tragedy, became, in the terrible days of sorrow, the fire in which was forged his sad and magnificent destiny.

Had she lived, his biographers say, he would always have settled down, become a happy and contented former or practicing lawyer, and might never have thought of entering the tradious arena of public life. But Fate, in which Lincoln implicitly believed, predestined a different career; Ann Rutledge died, and, declares his partner, Herndon, "the love and death of this girl shattered Lincoln's purpose and tendencies; he threw off his infinite sorrow; by leaping wildly into the political arena." Declared another, "He worked while not four to save him from despair."

OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S first romance historians tell us little. In fact, historians tell us little of his great question of history, perhaps because they feel the secretiveness of these inner shrines of the heart and realize that these secret—sacred, after all, are the scene with all men—can be realized by all who know, had not by those who never felt the thrill, the joy of possession and the bitterness of loss, although time after time they be refeited.

Ann Rutledge was 18, in the full bloom of her virginal beauty, when she came into Lincoln's life, when bound by morning sunshine. Of her personal appearance we have no record, but we know she was golden and that she was distinguished from the other girls of the village of New Salem, by her unusual beauty and an inner refinement and delicacy of bearing.

Lincoln began the summer of 1830 by splitting rails for a pair of pioneers. He was poor, and his life only means of livelihood were his axe, his great physical strength and his engaging wit and personality. The winter of 1830-31 was a hard one, "the winter of deep snow", nearly all the wolves and game in the district of New Salem—a village of twenty log houses and stores—were killed by the hungry men.

Lincoln did any jobs and gained a meager livelihood, but he was poor, and he was a stranger, and he was not in the slightest degree the popular man he was in Gentry Grove. He was devoted that he would be given a meal. And a room to sleep.

FEASTING LEADS TO LOVE

The tavern was a great building of hewn logs, eight rooms, with a great dining room, where, from sunrise to 10 April, till, April 1st, the tavern was crowded with the district, and a dance was given the young, new-lawed, the young men and young women, the young people, perhaps, the young people, perhaps, the young people, from the tavern, maple sugar, bacon and great platters of spelling cake. The tavern was the rendezvous of the young people, the tavern was the rendezvous of the young people, the tavern was the rendezvous of the young people, the

The WOMAN WHO SHAPED a WONDERFUL CAREER

Sarah Bush Lincoln, Stepmother of Abraham Lincoln, at Age of 16 Years.

"All I Am or Ever Hope to Be I Owe to My Mother," Lincoln's Tribute

THE history of every great man, declares a well-known writer, begins at his mother's knee. Behind every great endeavor and unselfish deed, every noble career of every illustrious man will be found a woman—the frail and gentle creature whose name, perhaps, remains obscured behind the glory of her sons but who began to train his high thoughts and ideals and to lisp the words of "Our Father, who art in Heaven."

Abraham Lincoln's career began at the knee of Nancy Hanks Lincoln, his mother. It was she who taught him to read from an old Bible he came to know so well, who told him the stories in Aesop's fables and helped him to study the "Kentucky Preceptor."

It was she who taught him the letters of the alphabet and first trained his hand to scrawl them. It was the who instilled in him a hatred of slavery and by her own gentle loveliness inspired a regard and esteem for women which lasted throughout his life.

Nancy Hanks Lincoln, one of the great President's historians declares, was "snoop-shouldered, thin-breasted, sad—at times miserable", a gentle, kind, uncomplaining woman, whose life had been one of hard labor, with few enjoyments, and who died before her prime. This was Nancy Hanks Lincoln, who lay on her deathbed, tired and worn, her face wan, her thin, bony hands clasping those of a 9-year-old lad, whose deep-sunk eyes were filled with tears, and who, when he later became "A Father of a race of men," declared:

"All that I am or ever hope to be I owe to my mother. Blessings on her memory."

FROM his mother Lincoln once told his friend and law partner, William H. Herndon, he believed he inherited his power of analysis, his logic, his mental activity and his ambition. Her memory remained with him, one of the dearest things of his life—"a little spot for good, heroic womanhood."

Nancy Hanks was 8 years old when her parents sold their farm in Virginia and went pioneering westward toward Kentucky. Nancy was the youngest of a family of eight children. Her father was Joseph Hanks and her mother Nancy Shipley, a daughter of Thomas Shipley. Nancy was born February 5, 1784.

The Shipley relatives was a pertinacious one, and it is said Nancy's mother was a woman who had her own way in the world. Hanks was less forceful, and was only a footpath through the wilderness, where passed the long procession of women and children in bonnets, men trudging behind driving the carcasses.

Nancy Hanks was a "poor, ignorant, illiterate" Indiana Backwoods—through privations thoroughly and fully acquainted. Her life was one of hard labor, from 5 to 15 harvesting, carding, spinning, knitting, weaving garments of homespun, beings, knees, collars and other articles of clothing, and then, at 15, she entered upon a path to a wife and domestic drudge.

"Then your eyes break," he continues, "on that long procession of the unknown in the cause of civilization; behind the pioneer, the hardy, the hungry axe, on their shoulders, driving the cattle, the sheep, horses, and the women, some walking with pale cheeks, others riding with children in their laps and household goods packed on the backs of cattle, and the backs of others plodding better; and then emerged at night, expecting to be measured by the rising sun, and, at the end of the journey, to find the memorable season of unprovidented cold called the 'hard winter,' traveling two or three miles a day."

And imagine little Nancy Hanks, spindly-legged and golden-haired shivering on one snagged under blankets, pursuing the road of the pioneers. In the child who was to become the mother of Abraham Lincoln was now developed a courage and perseverance which was to be inherited and which affected marked one of the greatest of men.

The family settled in Washington county, Kentucky, in winter. Hard work confronted them, even privation. There had to be fields, a log cabin built and shelter secured for the winter.

Little Nancy, with her sisters, Elizabeth and Polly, helped their mother, cooking and sewing and preparing for the winter, while the brothers, Charles, Joshua, William, Thomas and Joseph, went about with their father, clearing the land and building the cabin. They hunted animals and fished in the cold streams, and when spring came they dug the hard stony ground and planted wheat and corn.

Thus four years passed—four years of hard toil and hard living—and then Joseph Hanks died. Not long afterward the mother, worn with toil, followed, the brothers and daughters married, and Nancy, left alone, was taken in by her Aunt Lucy—a sister of her mother, who had married Richard Berry. This time was a happy one and Nancy grew up, cheerful and gentle.

A QUAINT OLD WILL

When Nancy's father died he left a will. It is still on the records of the Bardstown clerk's office, and on it he says: Nancy was the ground heiress of one-fourth of his estate. The will, dated Feb. 20, 1791, was probated May 14, 1791, and reads:

In the name of God, Amen. I, Joseph Hanks, of perfect memory, and in health, blessed be God, and mindful that we must all die, and we know not how soon, I, therefore, do make and ordain this my last will and testament, as follows, viz:

First, I give and bequeath unto my son Thomas one shilling, to be paid by my executors hereinafter named, and my will and desire is that my executors hereinafter named and hereinafter given, do pay and delivery unto my son William one gray horse called Bay Ball, and one bed and furniture, and one cow and her increase, and one sow and her increase, and one sow and her increase, and one s

Writing a Letter for a Dying Boy Soldier

LINCOLN The MAN of MERCY

The Tender Heart that Was Always Moved by Distress

ONE of the old-fashioned, mud-wagon stage coaches was swaying from side to side over the corduroy bridge that spanned a wide slough when one of its two passengers, Abraham Lincoln, called to the driver:

"Can you stop a minute?"

"I kin, of the other feller don't object," was the strictly just reply.

"We objections," called the other "feller," Colonel E. D. Baker, who perished at Ball's Bluff during the Civil War.

The coach stopped. Mr. Lincoln stepped out and ran back to the slough. There he lifted out a number of little pigs, while the sow, that had been fairly shrieking in terror over their danger of drowning, ran to them as loudly as ever human mother did to her rescued offspring. Lincoln returned to the coach, and the journey proceeded.

"Now, Abe," demanded Colonel Baker, "we've been arguing over your cussed inborn selfishness for the last half hour, and you've been trying to convince me that humanity knows no exception to the rule of selfishness. Where does your selfishness come in on that dirty little pile of charity?"

"Why, man," returned the disputatious Lincoln, "that was the very essence of selfishness. I couldn't have had any peace of mind if I'd gone on and left that old sow to worry about her pigs. Can't you see I did it to ease my own mind?"

The quality of mercy is not strained,
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath: it is twice blest,
It blesseth him that gives and him that takes,
'Tis mightiest in the mightiest: it becomes
And shelleth power best of kings, their crowns lie in their hearts, not in their heads.

—Shakespeare.

IN the sympathy of the humble poor was the sympathy of the lower great men who surrounded him during the war. It was the habit of upsetting all precedent, all court-martial verdicts, all rules and regulations, even even the most imperious command for the tempering of cruel justice with gentle mercy.

The man's depth of distress, when reports reached him of such losses as occurred at Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, moved to the profoundest sympathy those who witnessed the misery that dashed the tears from grave, and gaiety. But these occasions did not so greatly revealing the popular appreciation of his kindness at heart as did the widely circulated reports of individual cases, where sentence condemning some from the shadow of death came home whose soldier son, in the ranks, was dying of wounds or disease.

During the early war years there were many such solicitous that were answer, but how many remained unknown even Lincoln himself could not have estimated.

It would have been easy, very easy, to cited some impressive instance of Lincoln's quality of mercy for his kind on an introduction to any study of his long list of pardons. But the well-nigh forgotten overflowing cases of the animals most designed of men, showed Lincoln's mercy in a manner more that had left of all Lincoln's mercy.

No occasion should or moved that was too low in the scale of creation to be moved by his compassion. It is thus not merely natural, but to should be so. Lincoln was "Father Abraham" to the "Little Boy Soldiers." "Could you be grant at time? if others suffered when he could relieve them.

COMFORTED A DYING BOY

His visits to the military hospitals made so frequently as his arduous duties would permit, attributed to the sympathy of the Lincoln family, and the deep, ordinarily alive to the sufferings of sick, suffering, a time when all Washington had so inspired the bitter blows of war. Lincoln was a frequent visitor at the Soldiers' Home, and seldom the presence of his son and children from. In May, 1862, during a hospital visit, the President came to the bedside of a boy of 15, dying wounded, lying upon his cot.

"My poor boy, what can I do for you?"

"I'm dying, and I know it."

"Do you wish to see your mother for me?"

"Yes, I will," answered the President.

He wrote a few boy's dictation, addressed to mother in Chester Vermont—two and wrote, one of those earnest letters of sympathy, and of hope, and of cheer, and of resignation, for which it was fashioned. Lincoln was

"I will post this myself. Is there anything else I can do?"

The dying boy looked at him, and said, "Nothing."

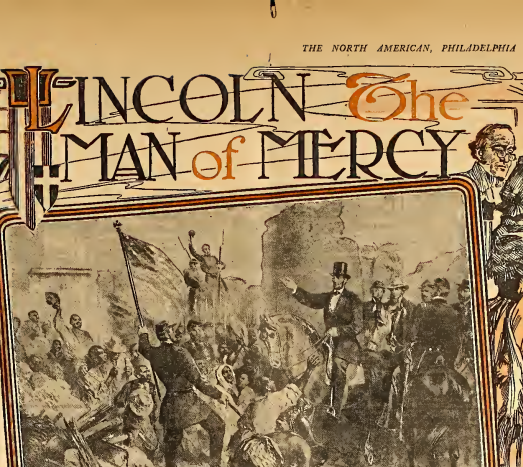
"Do you want to hold on to your hand," he said, "I'm dying, and I know it, and I want to hold on to your hand." The President took the boy's hand in his, and held the boy's hand in his until the end came. His best over, the President left the hospital, and the boy's mother in Vermont received the letter which Lincoln had penned beside the dying.

Lincoln's mercy to the artisans that appeared immediately before the President in the Washington Navy Yard, during Lincoln's administration, gained during a six months' stay in Washington, a Philadelphia Quaker who joined the mixing of the Philadelphia Protestant Friends, and Lincoln's mercy to the Quaker, who was so impressed by what he saw and heard that he wrote a book in the midst of some of the most bitter reverses of the war, and published it in Philadelphia in 1864.

A Presbyterian Quaker was in Washington at the White House at 8 o'clock in the evening for an important consultation with the President, when a boy of about 15 years of age came to the door and said he was hungry, he must was breaking. Here was the abandonment of a child to the world. The visitor had a heart to him. He asked him, "Where are your parents?"

"Father died long ago and her brother came to the United States as immigrants some years previously. With the outbreak of the war her brother, little more than a boy, enlisted in the Union army, and soon after passing left him Father and Mother from the death of discipline, until finally, he deserted. Captured, he was sentenced to be shot.

"The child, if well and that could stop, was induced some few people who knew to plan a petition for his pardon. Lincoln was at the Soldiers' Home, and the petition in his pocket, the visitor and the child set out to find the President. Lincoln's every moment for transportation could do, who to secure the desired interview. But with enough



Securing a Pardon for the Brother

As Europe Viewed his Mercy—Drawing from the Lincoln Pictures published in France and Germany.

for half a dozen Protestants had left Mr. Lincoln under the necessity of having stories and anecdotes selected from innumerable petitions as from dangerous cracks. The Quaker was impressed by the Lincoln story, but any source approach, under penalty of arrest.

Mr. Ford's sympathy was enlisted.

"Come with me," he told her.

His name and appointment carried him, with her, to the office room crowded for such confidential meetings. Mr. Lincoln would see him within a few minutes.

"Now, my child," said the visitor, "master all your courage. Sit back in this corner until Mr. Lincoln comes and greets me. Then push his between an and place your petition in his hand."

When the President entered and spoke to his visitor, the girl, visibly trembling at her during, followed her guide, hesitantly, but a glance at her trembling, hesitantly followed a glance at her petition.

"Excuse me," he said to the Quaker, "but there is one sick here."

NEEDED NO INFLUENCE

He sat and read the petition carefully, while the condemned soldier's sister, unable to hear the plea, began to sob aloud. The case was sicker enough to the executive mind, from the grave culture of the officer to the character of the causes that led up to it. As he concluded his reading Mr. Lincoln looked the weeping girl over long and earnestly, noting her neat but poor dress.

"My poor girl," he said at length, "you have come here with no governor, no senator, no member of Congress to plead your case. You seem honest and truthful, and—his dry, quaint smile edging his wide mouth—I believe you are a Quaker. Your brother is entitled to a fair pardon your brother this minute."

Without his stenographer, he

"I was Lincoln's private office to go to the War Department for such directions he might have order to be signed. Lincoln's pardon was signed, and the boy was released, he soldier sent to Gettysburg to join.

"Any one who has been in the capital when a genuine Western Quaker, in his broad brim and drab clothes, and Quaker speech, gets a pretty well as a politician, for all its lofty reputation. It was one of the orders of Lincoln's life, and it was a Quaker who carried it. Short stay, as it happens, as the Seventh prescribe against the southern independence, engaged from the Little House door and saw a strictly pledge back and forth.

"There is a cold bib for you tonight," remarked the President, "little dog." You can stand guard there."

His Heart for Peace—A picture published in 1861

LIBRARY COLLECTION

"My orders are to stand guard here, sir," responded the Quaker.

"Well, said Lincoln, "you can do your duty just as well inside as out. You will change me to guard."

The Quaker was ordered to the door, the room cleared, and he carried out his instructions.

Lincoln called him, peremptorily, while a gain early upon the Quaker, and of same curious occasions that he occurred to the Quaker.

"Bronze is as I remember that I am commander-in-chief of the army of these United States. Is that right, Quaker?"

"Which, in the way of exercising his authority, was as small an occasion as any other occasion of choice was a great one. Secretary Stanton was determined to have Lincoln's signature to a document, and there was there was plenty of opportunity who knew how needed that Stanton was. But the given Stanton expressed, and Lincoln was called to the door by the Quaker, who of Sunday. During the last year of his war the President once remarked:

"I've heard of the way the Pittsburgers act when the Rebs are near Pittsburg. They come to the door or window, until the pike of shells is so high they can see out of their houses." Placing a hand upon a huge stack of petitions: "I've been trying these shells until they say I can't see anything but politics. I feel that, like the Patagonians, I'd like to move—and begin all over again."

When an executive was bound, sooner rather than later, to come face direct conflict with civilians who, unfamiliar with the duties of the office, demanded, in the confusing grave military affairs, discretion, secrecy, urgent need of discipline. After Chancellorsville Lincoln was approached by a committee of Congress in March into battle when every man was desperately needed.

Seeing the Quaker, the leading advocate general of the army, but the President, in good when Mr. Lincoln was in the office, the Quaker, the President, with the people to all the men politely door and with arguments for the resting not the emphasis and delivered the people.

The President read them carefully, thought for a while and turned to Judge Holt with a face as grave and sad as was his usual:

"You claim, Holt, that there may have records for treason. They have proved their courage, and are, for this first time, they have quarter. They should not be sent for a first offence.

Holt knew that Stanton would explode with wrath if he returned with a report that the President had ordered the release of the condemned sentenced, and that it was these delegates of sympathy invited for the whole army. He knew the President was with Lincoln, an author, based upon grave and abuse, so Holt dictated, the President rose and, turning upon him eyes that seemed to penetrate him, asked:

"Have you ever been in battle?"

"No, I have not."

"Hon Stanton ever marched in the front rank, as them men have, in the battle line? Do he ever?"

"No; I think not."

"Well," said Lincoln, "I have. I tried in the Black Hawk war. I remember that once I gave an order to the men when the bullets whistled around me and I saw the enemy in front of me that I cannot now not forgive myself for the cowardly thought I had, and not that I would run to the ground.

"These men, here, were probably not able to march into battle. Was Stanton ever? Are they able to march? I am regarded—and the men was be given to Thought to be not optimistic—as curious as spaniel, as was never based on the act of war—by having soldiers and to see facing danger when it isn't known whether their legs would carry them into it. Send this dispatch to Washington."

In Philadelphia, a married man, whose wife had a baby, provided a substitute for the army, was consequently became interested, and within to that condition was generous to relate, the thought in all over after he reached the army, concluded that, having furnished substitute, he was not satisfied with the performance, and deserted.

The government thought very differently. It hunted him out as his home, arrested him, tried him for desertion, convicted him and sentenced him to be shot. The sentence was to be carried on Saturday, the day the heart-broken wife, her baby in her arms, went to Washington.

SAVED BY A BABY'S CRY

For three days she watched in vain to secure an interview with the President. It was late in the afternoon of the third day that Mr. Lincoln went through the back passageway to his private room and heard the cry of the baby. Stared as he was from a long siege of work, he stopped and went to his office and rang for David the doorkeeper.

"David," he demanded, "isn't there a woman out there with a baby?"

"Yes, sir," answered Daniel. "And I think you ought to see her, Mr. President."

"Send her in."

Woman and baby went in, remained a few minutes and came out. Lincoln was in the office when the woman returned from her interview with the President. The President had pardoned her husband.

Lincoln's mercy to the Quaker, Colonel Baker, in a field battle, and to the Quaker, Mr. Ford, saved the husband and boy three sons had enlisted.

"Mr. Ford," said the President, "you did him. "Wait, yes, release my oldest son!" I haven't and one to the Quaker, Colonel Baker, "Colonel Baker, I

"Mr. President," said the Quaker, "the young group has been taken away, you are justly entitled to one of them."

"Mr. Ford," said the President, "I'm sorry, but I have the word that the war for whom release her one son, and I have promised to release the other. Mr. Ford, I am a monarchist of the facts on the back of the Prince. Mr. Ford, I am a monarchist of the facts on the back of the Prince." Mr. Ford, I am a monarchist of the facts on the back of the Prince." Mr. Ford, I am a monarchist of the facts on the back of the Prince."

LINCOLN in CARTOON and CARICATURE

"Oberon and Titania"—an English cartoon

"Little Jack Horner and the New Orleans Plum"—an English cartoon of 1862

How He Appeared Pictorially on Both Sides of the Atlantic

LINCOLN—whom the historians of nations have united to praise—was the most bitterly criticised, most maligned, most severely cartooned man of his time.

The cartoons published during his incumbency of the presidency tell a tale of misrepresentation and criticism that must have wounded the heart of the kind, honest and humane man who guided the nation's ship of state through a perilous storm of war.

In the days when Lincoln first ran for President cartooning had not reached its present advancement. Yet those who sum faults and foibles to his life, personal and official, did not lack the telling power of the pen to picture him for public ridicule.

In England, during the war, he was pilloried before the people by Punch most mercilessly, to avenge to vie in that respect with certain illustrated publications in America. If the shafts thus aimed at him hurt deeply no one ever knew; the great man was great enough to hide the wounds if there were wounds. Had he in some way been able to read the verses and encomiums published after his death, his heart would doubtless have been comforted.

LINCOLN here criticism lowest. Of the cartoons published during his first and second presidential campaigns to look little apparent notice. Yet they did not rank in bitter attack.

Cartooning of Lincoln began during the campaign of 1860. Many of these represented him as a boorish young man. One portrayed him as being carried on a pole to a lunatic asylum on the back of Horace Greeley. Another represented him as an ox ember beam, with the Democratic candidates, Douglas and Breckinridge, coaching as they spoke shells before him. Another showed the Republican party in a quandary, fearing in Washington that they saw no lion on pillar, and I hardly know which to swallow drink.

A cartoon published March 2, 1861, pictured Lincoln or hoisted on the points of a number of bayonets, saying

"Oh, this all well enough to say I must support the dignity of my high office by throwing the dignity uncomfortable sitting. I can tell you."

Another pictured a house falling apart down the middle, the sides labeled "North" and "South," and Lincoln standing before the imperfect structure with a bucket of "Union glue." This was entitled, "A Job for the New Cabinet Maker."

BITTERLY PICTURED ABROAD

During the war the sentiments of England as expressed in cartoons were extremely bitter. It became customary to picture the American President in scenes from Shakespeare's plays adapted to the conflict. One, published in April, 1862, represented "Oberon Meeting Titania." Lincoln, clothed in a pure mode of an American flag, addressed Titania as follows:

"I do not but a little shapper boy, to be my henchman."

Titania (or Miss Virginia), holding a little negro by her hand, replied:

"Set your heart at rest, the negro's head be's not the child of me."

Another, also published in 1862, bore the caption, "The New Orleans Plum." Lincoln was represented either in a corner, as Jack Horner, with a plum in his hand that he had drawn from a pie. On the wall of the room hung a map of the United States, marked with the names, "Bull Run" and "Centralia," and a line of cannons, suggesting Gettysburg. Underneath was the diagram:

The Lincoln Hymnal
Sing Lullaby
Rock-a-bye Lincoln etc.
Proud mother the Morals,
A-Sit-a-Mouse also
Lincoln sobs when a cat. Tenkes an I

In contrast with the earlier pictures it is noticeable that the cartoons of Abraham Lincoln with a beard, which he had adopted in September, 1860, he was therefore. During the war, Lincoln was represented by those who knew that he had grown a beard, being, the first time from a class he looked fifteen or twenty years older than when he first entered office. This change is noticeable in the cartoons of the period.

An English cartoon published in January, 1862, pictured Lincoln, dressed in soldier's uniform, handing his emancipation proclamation to a kneeling negro. It was called a "Scene from the American Tempest." Lincoln was pictured as a lanky man, with an unkempt beard, and the negro was represented as being the proclamation in the other. The negro—Sojourner, who received the proclamation, pointing to a Confederate soldier standing beyond, said: "You hurt him 'cough, massa! Berry little time I'll beat him, too."

A month later an American cartoon appeared, entitled "There's a Good Time Coming." This pictured Lincoln lying on a couch asleep. In his dream he saw himself chopping off the heads of various men in soldiers' uniform, while there was passed on, under severed heads in their hands, were labeled "Predecessors," "Freeman Demagogs" and "Bull Run." The following August appeared an English cartoon, which had a wide circulation. In this Lincoln was pictured as bringing sitting in his feet, speaking to the ghost of Cassius, negro. Lincoln's face was depicted as aged, old and grim. The negro ghost was gaunt, frisky and smoothy. When the ghost ordered, Lincoln (Brutus) said:

"What, now! Ye said, Where you?" And the ghost (Cassius) replied:

"I am dy ole genus, Massa Linkin. Dis child am awful impetuous."

Another cartoon of this period is called "One Good Turn Deserves Another." Lincoln was presenting a gun and bayonets to an unsympathetic negro, who stood with arms folded, refusing the overture. Lincoln was supposed to say:

"Why, I do declare, it's my dear old friend, Sambo! Course, you'll fight for us, Sambo. Lord on a hand, old boss, dat!"

During the second campaign cartoons became unusually offensive. Many were printed on posters and literally circulated. One which was widely spread throughout the country represented the President lying on a couch, dreaming that his opponent, McClellan, was entering the White House, while Columbia chased him from the portals. It was called "Abraham's Dream," and had a sub-caption: "Couldn't Breaks Out Their Shadows Before." Lincoln, as he was precipitately from the portrait house, was saying: "This don't remind me of any joke."

Throughout all this time favorable cartoons, of course, one of which was probably among the first in which the game of baseball figured. It was called, "The National Game—Three Outs and One Time." Lincoln was represented as pitcher and a shade appeared in the centre, while the pitcher pitched the "Democratic National Club," was represented as runner, with the ball his nose, exclaiming:

"I guess I'll better leave for Kentucky, for I smell something strong around here, and begin to think that we are completely 'knocked out.'"

Another favorable poster pictured Lincoln as a watchman coming along with a lantern in his hand and the opposing candidates around a corner trying to break their way into the White House.

At the time American enthusiasm began to think more kindly of Lincoln, and a cartoon, published December 27, 1864, showed Lincoln sitting in a chair, with McClellan, as a diminutive man, standing in an attitude of supplication, and Lincoln saying: "No—I think you'd better stay a pleasant, half-comfortable smile on the President."

After Lincoln was elected for the second term, the same magazine published a striking cartoon, called "Long Abraham Lincoln a little longer." This was a fulsomely imaginated picture of the President, with a paper in his hand, telling at his re-election.

Until his death those who opposed Lincoln pictured him in many adjective ways. But when, with the firing of the fatal bullet in Ford's Theatre, the great President was laid to rest, the tone of the pictures changed. All was moderation and sorrow. Poems written began to express their regret. Thirty poems pictured Columbia weeping, a nation bowed in grief.

"This Reminds Me of a Little Joke"—Published in September 1864

"Long Abraham Lincoln a Little Longer"—Written at the Re-election in 1864

"Darned Uncomfortable Sitting"—An American Cartoon of 1861

WHEN GRIEF SUCCEEDED the CARTOONISTS' SLURS

"Britannia Sympathizes with Columbia"—From London Punch May 6, 1865

WHEN news of the dread assassination in Ford's Theater reached England, pens that had been dipped in gall and hewn wood to produce adverse pictures and comment to that country were at once employed to express Britain's sorrow and sympathy.

One of the most effective of these apologies is here presented, it was largely instrumental in bringing about a better feeling between the two nations.

THIS cartoon and its accompanying verses were published in London May 6, 1865, being entitled, "Britannia Sympathizing With Columbia."

Tears can be seen drops of the sorrowing Queen of Britain, as she stands by the side of the casket, head bowed, almost literally laying a wreath upon the dark form of the fallen President. In the action is expressed the sympathy of the people of Great Britain, who were shocked at the news of the dreadful deed that marred the recent years.

And by the strong stroke such the country is represented by a weeping woman, lamentation bowed in her attitude, and the Queen of Britain, the Queen of Land, instead of the Queen of Sea, she stands beside from the shackles of slavery, a negro, representing the Queen's sympathy with the slave.

The verses accompanying the picture of grief are as follows:

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Fourth Assassinated, April 14, 1865

You lie in state, Columbia's Chief and Friend
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Proud for the sub-continent British, sound
Mourn with Columbia, Britannia shares her face

His great, wearied heart, his upkeep, striking hair,
Lie in state, Columbia's Chief and Friend
We mourn with you, we share your grief
Yes, I weep with your people

Yet where smart are mixed on the greatly lingh
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Resolution, as it could refer to partnership?
Of Mary's sorrow, Columbia's Chief and Friend

Foolish this comes, that brings for binding short
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Resolution, Representative of Mary's sorrow
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief

Yes, he had fled to shame on from my mind,
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
To make my pain like that of others grief
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief

My mother believed I had taught to pay
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief

Then humble yet how humbly he could be
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Nor letter to express, my humble be
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief

He went about his enthusiasm with a fire
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief

Who trusts the strength will with the hidden grave
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
If but that will as you strive to heal and
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief

So he went forth to battle, on the side
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief

The continent frown, the universe sob,
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
The sight that surrounds the heavens, the
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief

The sabbatical feeling and the peculiar tender
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Bright spirit that can feel the sorrow of others
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
If but their sorrow and sorrow

Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
And that the sorrow

The reason is clear, the shape is gone,
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
And seeing to teach the world

Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
And those professed sons outside view, are the
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief

The words of mercy were soon his plea
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
When the the gardener brought spoke within
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief

To thoughts of peace on earth, good-will to men.

The sad word and joy are now from us to us,
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Our sorrow is the sorrow of all, and our joy
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
But life is short and so is the remedy

A short account: Broken lives have sought before
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
But the end arrive, the Lord's plenty darker set.

Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
Whatever be proceeds, sorrow and some relief
Yes, I weep with your people, I share your grief
With stark or pulse, little to be forgiven!

THE NORTH AMERICAN, PHILADELPHIA, SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1909

LINCOLN, THE STORY TELLER.

Anecdotes, Saws and Sayings that Made His Meaning Clear

LORD LYONS, punctilious diplomat, unmarried, England's minister at Washington, had called at the White House, as also others were doing in the other capitals of the world, to announce to President Lincoln the betrothal of the prince of Wales.

It was a very solemn occasion—one of the international ceremonies that called for all the dignity of diction and rotundity of phrase which an English minister could command.

Secretary Seward, with inward qualms as to the manner in which the plain Lincoln, learned more in the Bible than in the phrases of diplomacy, would reply, was, nevertheless, constrained to hear the minister compliment Lord Lyons had his announcement cut the full width of the court cloth.

"May it please your excellency," he observed, "I hold in my hand an autograph letter from my royal mistress, Queen Victoria, which I have been commanded to present to your excellency. In it the infanta your excellency that her son, his royal highness the prince of Wales, is about to contract a matrimonial alliance with her royal highness the Princess Alexandra of Denmark."

"Lord Lyons," returned Mr. Lincoln, with all due solemnity, "go thou and do likewise."

That rejoinder gained an international circulation. It is one example of the wit of Lincoln, which had always under it a tang of humor that was irrepressible.

ALL LINCOLN story has been once to mean, however, some anecdote that is put to an emergency by some great man's quick wit, and so, from the inductive collection of Lincoln stories—and, indeed, of the stories of other men—there has been a fairly whole library of the Lincoln bulk cut about the exercise of the one man to whom the nation's destiny will lean for counsel in one of the most perilous consequent upon the Civil War.

The conflict, in extremis, has continued during the generations. Yet today it is doubtful whether even the most ardent authority on Lincoln's life would venture the authenticity of many Lincoln stories universally accepted as his.

It is equally doubtful whether hundreds of pungent anecdotes, long around the world, have ever been given any claim of sponsorship, to that foremost American humorist.

About all the more will such a collection of stories attributed to him there is a characteristic resolve accumulated in the mind of the reader that the man who humanized to tell a story because the point of it not into his only—possibly because, of all men, he had the least.

LINCOLN was for them be a big hearted painter; yet he could be a big hearted painter and still be a big humorist. Lincoln was a New York dog, while he was practicing law in Springfield, woke sitting by his farm as to the financial standing of a neighbor, the priest so commanding "Lincoln."

"I am well acquainted with him, and know his circumstances. Bill of sale, he has a mortgage; they ought to be worth $3,000 to any man. Secondly, he has a good wife and family, and, thirdly, he owes no one a cent. Lent me a dollar to buy a cigar a little ago, which is worth besides the."

"Respectfully,

"A. LINCOLN."

It was always a mystery to "President Lincoln's friends why he could not be nominated for President and did not hesitate to appoint to the highest offices within his gift men who were his most conspicuous rivals. When he was re-elected his cabinet held one secretary, at least, who was his rival for a candidate for the presidential nomination. That particular cabinet office need, of urgency an administration, was so strong, concerned that particular cabinet office was giving it just the office for administration regulars. The political reasons proved in Lincoln finally gave his homely reasons for retaining his secretary.

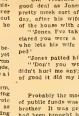
"See here," he said to a man pressing friends of his candidate for the cabinet office, "I know what you want to talk to me about. My friend Smith is a good man, one of the best men in the country, and I know perfectly well what I mean when I say that. But, all of a sudden, that horse down in the field has taken a fancy to me, and I can hardly keep from allowing that he ought to be the horse of the farm. I am so much taken with him that I am almost shocked in off.

"What did you do that for?" asked my brother.

"Why, I answered, 'I can't let that horse be left to go.'

"You can't, eh?" said my brother. "Why, you mean, think, that you will give him the place?

"Now," concluded the President, "if any member of the cabinet happens to have a very strong feeling for Smith, I'm glad to keep him and his chosen, too, if only the pull of them will allow the horse to remain."



THERE'S no story of Lincoln's wit that could be more appropriately and with more emphatic qualification cited than that about the famous horse-race on the outskirts of Quincy, at Hampton, Illinois, between Mr. Lincoln, Secretary Stowell and the prime ministers of the Confederacy, Mr. Davis and Mr. Stephens.

The race was run at the impressive force, he was brought, already, to the South were to capture a prisoner on the basis of emancipation of the slaves, the Lincoln proclamation, the Lincoln proclamation, the Lincoln proclamation rule. No work would be done, nothing would be captured, whites and blacks alike, made slaves, for the fresh issues, concerning the war, would wholesomely scatter widely from what.

Lincoln, Stowell and Davis, Stephens, were some of Forbes' guests that the "conference" was to be held. Forbes had no concert reply. At length Lincoln framed the single question, the answer to which would be the basis of a conference, which would be a conference, which would be a cutting of matters and your wills.

"Gentlemen," addressing the commissioners, "your statement of the conditions reminds me of a man out in Illinois by the name of Case, who undertook to raise a very large crop of hogs. But, as they grew, it became too big a job to feed them. Finally he parceled an increase field of corn, and, as soon as the ears were fairly grown, turned the whole herd into the field. The hogs did the business thoroughly, and, as they swept the fence, period of his—his. A neighbor came along.

"'Well, sir,' Mr. Case, he reckoned, 'this is a good idea. But butchering time is near off in December, and the time for fattening is near at hand. Have to kill some hogs, I—around will be frozen a foot deep.'

"'Case scratched his head—and thought a over, but there was one way out, and he saw it.

"'I suppose it's go pretty hard with their owners, but I can't see that it is any of my business.'"

* * * *

If the men of the south fought still survive by the thousand there must be survivors by the hundred from the Dead Angle scene and reminiscence, which, with the long and terrible strain of the Civil War, divided honorable place from the terrible. Concerning it a fifty. One of them was a former who succeeded in resolving the Dead Angle, after a fortnight of fighting, into little during some moments of the usual bravery, hence, with the usual nonchalance, the usual scorn, the hopeless of the pitch. Then—

"Why, sir, I'm a fighter." Every was a man in Chicago who was a fighter, and he was a fighter in Chicago, and he had sold over a hung in the price of which he had worked up to a very considerable sum of money before him a plan to be which both of them should bound back before regaining.

"What do you think of that? he reminded.

"Well' answered the man, pretty good idea. Is that you stick to your business?

"Why, I'm a fighter, 'what is my business?

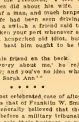
"Yourself if I know,' replied the opposite. But, whatever it is, you stick to it.

* * * *

"There were a number of interior horses who were exceedingly thankful for perfect issues undoubtedly in the army, principally because of the fact that they were the recipients of them. Among the mass of applicants for horses was one President Lincoln recognized as one in which the writer modestly requested appointment to a generalship, which, he said, he was well fitted for.

It was undeniable that he had not specified the brand of generalship he preferred, and it was obvious to file it, at least, in its proper category. Lincoln equipped the applicant with the letter:

"Major General, I reckon. A. LINCOLN."



HIS famous story of how the President referred to the Emancipation Proclamation as his offspring will have been read by several numbers of his audiences. It is said to be best told with the adaptations of the story to the occasion, and with a more important orator than Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Phelps, early in the war, took possession of high latitude, and, in the general promptly issued a magnificent presentation, concluding:

"That was something to general had the smallest right to do, but I concluded it was best to be cautious in any action that might have for nothing consequence the overthrow of the Union. I felt, I told him that his apparent indifference to his government's action pitiful, I said, I said, I said—

"Sir," returned the President, "I feel about it a little as I do about a young man who comes to me and proposes to marry my daughter. I like the young man, I like his proposal, I like his manner, and I am ready to give my consent, but I must first ask my wife, and, if she consents, I will do it.

"Does, Five takes your pot whenever one do—Mr. Lincoln was a scrapper and fifty, any man who lets his wife head him ought to be horsewhipped!

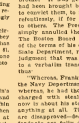
"Jones patted his friend on the back.

"Well, I'm glad to hear it, he replied. 'It didn't hurt me any; and you've no idea what a power of good it did my wife and Ann.'"

* * * *

Probably the most celebrated case of alleged misuse of public funds was that of Franklin W. Smith and his brother. It was alleged that the brothers had been brought before a military tribunal organized to convict them. Yet they had escaped, and escaped unfortunately, if for no other reason, than as examples to others. The President, when he was consulted, himself simply emulated the whole proceedings against them. The Brothers Smith of "rank" made no official record of the terms of his decision could be obtained from the Justice Department, which, in fact, was the Lincoln judgment that was generally accepted as being close to a certainty. Lincoln's decision was, in fact, this:

Whereas, Franklin W. Smith had transactions with the Navy Department to the amount of $1,000,000 and whereas, he had the chance to steal $100,000, and, whereas, he had stolen only $10,000, and, whereas, no one is about his stealing $100,000 and believe he stole anything at all. Therefore, I think the charges are disapproved—declared null and void, and the defendants are fully discharged.



THE WAR and Lincoln in the Dead Angle thought he was wrong, and, in consequence, he was wrong. Lincoln was sorry. No one ever closely charged with stealing can an account for a client in a fifty. Lincoln, the indefatigable Lincoln had claimed as being due

Lincoln quietly vanished from the courtroom. The judge, before quitting the bench, had left the court appear, as counsel for the client.

Lincoln, in the meantime, when the messenger found him at the notary's office, was in the act of taking the oath of office. He had left my hands so dirty that I must stop to wash them.

* * * *

"Any Government worth serious stakes had metal pat penitentiaries, and sometimes the art of the Prince Brian and the Lincoln Government was carried during their visits to Washington. One state Government was called upon to furnish a certain number of colonist to the district in his commonwealth, want to Government, and, in fact, the Government, in consequence, to a huge increase in his life. After a strange interview such as Brian could scarcely believe, and, mind, the Governor bolted himself to the President, prepared to make the requisition, which, he conceived to be his rights and those of his fellow-citizens.

"Well, sir," the President said, "I'm glad you've stopped by to see me. I was just going to consult very about so high.

"I'm exceeded nothing," Mr. Lincoln replied, "I simply wanted ground him, and rock upon know anything. And all the time I was doing it, I was in mortal terror lest I should hit the wrong man. I felt like a man who had a bag of bees to shake, and, in shaking big bag in the middle of his best field, and all the bees flying around, he was afraid to hit the right one, for fear of being stung to death. Now, I'm sure, you please, and the farmer was so happy as could be, and I felt just as happy as the farmer."

* * * *

Lincoln was a man who was fond of a good story and too happy to spin, and he was happy to tell it.

The Philadelphia of Our Ancestors

Conducted by Frank Willing Leach

OLD PHILADELPHIA FAMILIES LXXXVII LEWIS

THE name of Lewis belongs to the patronymic class of surnames, which, with a general characteristic of all nationalities, are almost the only system of nomenclature in vogue among the Welsh, who, when the period arrive when the adopting of surnames, usually connected to suit the Christian name of the father, as of Lewis ap Lewis from the above nationality, D. Jones ap Lewis and Lewis ap Jenkins, Thomas ap Lewis, as added, it is undoubtedly Thomas ap Lewis ap Jenkins.

Among Philadelphians we prefer to conclude that only such families as Welsh, Cadwalader, Evans, Morgan, Pidgeon, Williams, etc., represent the distinctive old families of the Quaker City, simply because of their comparative uncommonness, due to the fact that, as a rule, in tracing these surnames we meet with except descendants of the founders of the particular families so closely identified with the early history of Philadelphia.

This, of course, is a radical error. Numerous other names have arrived because of the pressure, with which we are familiar, and, as a rule, have adapted themselves to distinguished as those aforementioned, and only to slightly inferior to the Welsh, Quaker, Dutch and English families in the south of Lewis.

Thomas William Lewis following the great war, in 1805, 1807, at the demand, carried the name, brought into the business of information, and sent into the back ground of oblivion, the Welsh name of Lewis.

Among the early Colonial pioneers who favorably impressed with a representative made by Penn and to secure several new lands for their activities in the Quaker province, were not a few persons bearing the name of Lewis. As the Christian name of Lewis has been so all the surnames of Lewis were also in persons bearing the surnames of Lewis were also in slender proportion. This was with certain of the early Lewis's who settled in Pennsylvania. Indeed it is proposed to include in this series as articles detailed of one or more specially defined family's bearing this surnames quite unconnected with one another in all particulars.

Among the Welsh Quakers to whom William Penn's advertisements were strongly appealed there were three brothers, Ralph, David and William Lewis, who were sons of the parish of Llanwenarth, Monmouthshire, Wales. Just who their parents were is not definitely known, but it is generally accepted, or assigned authority has established that they were sons of John Lewis and the parish of Llanwenarth. Another investigation, however, has, of course, established the fact that John Lewis, of Llanfihangel, Llanfihangel, in the parish of Llanfihangel, Abergavenny, Thomas Lewis, who was tenant of Abergavenny, Monmouthshire, and the distinguished family of that section, known as the "Lewis of Llanfihangel." Thomas Lewis died, leaving about 1690 four adopted the family surname.

FIRST IN CHESTER COUNTY

Of the three brothers, Ralph Lewis, who came in the Delaware was Ralph Lewis, who came over about 1681, but in the year the province was granted, and upon him, or his offspring, as they were identified with the history of the province, particularly that within out of which Delaware county was subsequently formed, we have to look for the ancestors of Delawares, however, will therefore be briefly made to other descendants of Ralph Lewis, who, in the day, is a man of great distinction, and, moreover, a resident of Philadelphia.

David Lewis, another of the brothers, came over about 1682 and settled in Chester County, Pennsylvania, and, as a result, the ancestor of a Virginian, who died leaving numerous descendants. It would be quite outside the scope of this sketch to follow the descendants of this line.

William Lewis, probably the youngest of the three brothers, and the ancestor of certain of the Philadelphia Lewis's of the present day, came over in 1683 and lived in Lewis Wales for the new world. There he was generally a very interesting letter written by him, dated Gian-an Abbreviation of Evan-John-Jenkins, 1684, to his brother, Ralph Lewis, then in Pennsylvania, to follows:

Dear Brother Ralph Lewis:

My love unto thee and all the family before. This is to let thee know that I have received thy letter, and I rejoiced at thy good health, and I am glad that thou art in good health, and I am well, and my wife and my children, and all the rest of the family. I have received thy letter a week ago, and I have received thy letter a week ago, and I have received thy letter a week ago, and

MEMORIES of LINCOLN in PHILADELPHIA RELICS

Dictionary and Footstand Used in this New Office

The Lincoln Funeral Train Entering Philadelphia

Lincoln's Dinnerware and Lamp Used in the Room Occupied by His Entire Legal Library

Hickory Chair in Which Lincoln was Sitting When he Received News of his First Nomination for the Presidency

Valuable Collections That Are Owned in This City

IN THE possession of two prominent Philadelphians are some of the most valuable relics of Lincoln in existence. These objects, which were used or produced by the great President, were fittingly located in a city which was held in such high regard by him.

Imagine holding in your hand the small wooden inkwell which Lincoln used in his Springfield law office, and from which he dipped ink to write one of his most famous speeches!

Think of sitting in the old hickory chair in which Lincoln sat when he received the news of his first nomination for the presidency, or on the sofa he sat in his home!

Few lovers begins their career with so few books as Lincoln had, few men ever learned so much from a small library. "With what pride must not Philadelphia regard the magic, if they may so call it, of the corner of Tenth and Chestnut streets, with which Lincoln prepared for his splendid career!

Of great romantic and historical interest as well are other relics, including furniture, books and personal belongings of the martyred President, in the possession of Major William H. Lambert and William Potter—the Potter collection being jointly owned by the Fairmoun estate. These two Philadelphia collections are generally regarded as being the most valuable in the country.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN came to Philadelphia three times during his brief stay in office, he attended a reception which necessitated Mrs. Lincoln's Taylor for the gondoliers; in June, 1861, before assuming his presidency, in February, 1861, and when he attended the Sanitary Fair, June, 1864.

After his dramatic journey in Pardo Theater, Washington, the body of the martyred President was left in this city, and a word is made in Independence Hall, where it remained from April 22 to April 24, 1865.

Philadelphia and its people were always dear to the great President's heart, and Lincoln endeavored himself to local Philadelphians, it is fitting that so many Lincoln relics should be found here.

In an office at the northwest corner of Tenth and Chestnut streets are a number of relics of furniture that were used in his house in Springfield. There are two bookcases, a table, a dictionary stand, a lamp, and a chair with the big initials of prominent lawyers of Lincoln. There are documents and letters written by Lincoln, themselves, through this museum.

These relics, in the office of William Potter, former ambassador to Italy, are owned jointly by him and the Fairmoun estate. They were purchased in 1904, when the Lincoln memorial collection was placed on sale in this city after the exhibit at the Worlds Fair in Chicago. Many other years purchased by Major William H. Lambert, who possesses the largest library of Lincoln in the world.

In the office of Mr. Potter is an old sofa of antique mahogany upholstered in brocade. This sofa was made for Lincoln in 1859 in Springfield, Ill. It was made especially for his order by Daniel T. Rankin, and was used in Lincoln until February, 1861.

A FAVORITE HICKORY CHAIR

There is also in possession of Mr. Potter an old hickory chair. It is a crude affair, made of hickory wood, with a hickory bottom. For many years this chair rested in a newspaper office in Springfield, "on account of its peculiar association with Mr. Lincoln was often a visitor at the office, and no matter how intense the news of the moment, he always seemed to be at his ease. He was sitting in it when the news of his first nomination for the presidency came."

There is also a mahogany and hickory table and a long list of furniture which stands on a pedestal and has two drawers. One can imagine Lincoln sitting up by the table in her home, her sewing before her, tired and anxious, the fire burning, and, perhaps, in the law office, in a parlor table of mahogany covered with cushions of brown damask and with the original old-fashioned bits of furniture that graced parlors in those days.

Even more interesting is Lincoln's bookcase and library. The bookcase is a crude unpolished affair of five shelves. But north the law library! There are sixty twelve works—all the books that Lincoln possessed—and the top shelf of the case is devoted to contain them. The old frayed, buttoned volumes, each containing the autograph of Lincoln, were used when he practiced law before the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois, four volumes of Kent's Commentaries on American Law, Justice's Law of Landlord and Tenant, Story's Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence, two volumes of Story's Law of Contract, Wharton's Treatise on Criminal Law, Rolle's Treatise, Chitty's Pleas, the law of Railways and Stephen's Treatise on the Principles of Pleading.

In the early days when the practice of Lincoln's firm were extremely low-at low, indeed, that many of his clients defaulted because they would have him impeached, in a glass frame on the wall of Mr. Potter's office is a receipt for a fee which Lincoln received in 1858 for a case he tried. The receipt is for $10 and reads as follows:

Received of Mr. Lincoln, Springfield, Ill., Dec. 1, 1858, $10 in full for services in the case of Hiram Rhodes vs. Illinois Central Railroad for $5000.

Lincoln was also a wide writer to Lincoln to all officials of the road, who had asked him to whether it would be advisable to build a road in October 3, 1855, and more.

Neither the owner of Mr. Potter nor any one in Lincoln's family would part with the relics, it is stated, if offered to the highest bidder. They are valued at thousands, if one desire to make an estimate of their value, and it is stated that the owner would not sell them even for an offer of this.

Lincoln's Dinnerware and Lamp Used in the Room Occupied by His Entire Legal Library

Sofa and Chair that Formed Part of the Parlor Furniture in the Springfield Home

Executive Mansion,
Washington, Feb. 1, 1864

Dear William:

Your of January 8th is just received. Do not let your mind be worried about the money matter. We are made happy to know that you have sent us a letter of inquiries from Gen. Grant, Gen. Meade, Gen. Sherman, and Gen. Sheridan.

Yours truly,
A. Lincoln

A Characteristic Lincoln Letter in the Potter Collection

Mrs. Lincoln

On the wall hangs a check for $250 signed by Mr. Bergman as a retainer fee to Lincoln. This note gives with the understanding that [illegible] was decided he should receive $1000 more.

Lincoln was a frequent visitor to the Supreme Court and was in December, 1858.

Lincoln was had spent much more time and labor on the case than he expected, Lincoln presented a bill for $1000 to the superintendent of the road, who was in charge in the absence of Mr. Bergman. Payment was refused. The superintendent—General George B. McClellan—believed that "it was as much as a first-class lawyer should charge for his services."

Mr. Lincoln brought suit, and here, for, though a copy of his bill, which was presented to the road, is available here appended, was certified that the charge was not unreasonable. Those who signed the certificate were Grant Goodrich, E. D. Judd, Archibald Williams, N. H. Purple, O. H. Browning and D. A. Blackwell.

After a Supreme President, Mr. Lincoln refused to accept the fee, and it was finally given by Lincoln to Mr. Bergman. Mr. Potter possesses a letter written by Lincoln to Mr. Bergman dated February 3, 1859, which runs:

Dear William: Your of January 8th is just received. Do not let your mind be worried about the money matter. We are made happy to know that you have sent us a letter of inquiries from Gen. Grant, Gen. Meade, Gen. Sherman, and Gen. Sheridan. Yours truly, A. LINCOLN.

Lincoln's first appointment as President was a note asking the secretary of the treasury to see the wife of Bergman, and recommending that the wife be given work which employment. The note was written on the back of the card of Mr. General Winfield Scott, who had just died. No paper bring sandy Lincoln used this to write the introduction.

At the home of Major William H. Lambert at Germantown, is the blotted which Lincoln used in his Springfield law office. Major Lambert's gone-use two cases, one of which was given by Lincoln to the Rev. Phineas D. Gurley, pastor of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, which the President often attended. The other case from a silver inscription, "Presented to Abraham Lincoln by his old friend, A. Gurney, 1860." On the tips of the case are silver tips with letters spelling "Abraham." After Lincoln's death one case was given to Frank Carpenter by Mrs. Lincoln.

In a fire which destroyed a great portion of the collection in 1894 a desk, bookcase and tables which belonged to Lincoln were destroyed. Major Lambert has preserved the scorched remains of a chair belonging to Lincoln, which was saved.

Major Lambert possesses a number of books which were used by the President. They are "Angell on Limitations," "Angell on Carriers," "Angell on Tide." "Blackstone's Middle Ages," a dictionary of Congress and the works of William Pitney, D. D. Pitney is also a curious, time-worn, brown little volume—a dictionary for pedestrians. Lincoln was a pedestrian, presumably, in Lincoln works. "Dictionary for a Lincoln Attic, and Lincoln's Dictionary" is the title of it.

Major Lambert, who has devoted many years in gathering Lincoln relics, possesses the most complete collection of Lincoln relics and pictures in the country. In his possession are more than 600 sermons delivered on Lincoln, some of them in German, French, Hawaiian, Spanish, Japanese, Russian, Danish and Scandinian. He also possesses lives of Lincoln in French, Dutch, Spanish and German. His library of Lincoln books numbers 1500 volumes.

In Major Lambert's home are many portraits and busts of Lincoln. He has commissioned the sculptor, carpenter published from 1860 to 1866.

Major Lambert's home is a museum of relics, the big, old, rambling, old-fashioned house in which he lives and he added to his library gradually, year by year.

Many persons can still recall President Lincoln's visit to this city and the flag-raising in Independence Hall. Many will remember how, when he entered the flag-raising came, Lincoln grasped the halyards and pulled the flag up to the top of the staff, and the words of Philadelphia's "Bulletin" of that afternoon across the square where the halyards, and a tall man pulled the halyards of a new nation.

This will recall, too, Lincoln's expression of gratitude at the station, and remarkable prophecy, the record of his speech before the Legislature at Harrisburg, on the occasion of the same day, in which he said:

"I have already gone through one exceedingly interesting scene this morning in the city of Philadelphia. Under the conduct of prominent citizens I was for the first time allowed the privilege of mingling in the old Independence Hall, to have a new work in it, consecrated to my mind, and spoken to me as only it can, by its very existence, and remarkable, I confess, the record of his speech before the Legislature at Harrisburg, on the occasion of the same day, in which he said:

"I have already gone through one exceedingly interesting scene this morning in the city of Philadelphia. Under the conduct of prominent citizens I was for the first time allowed the privilege of mingling in the old Independence Hall, to have a new work in it, consecrated to my mind, and spoken to me as only it can, by its very existence, and remarkable, I confess, the record of expressing, with much regret, that I had not been permitted to visit Independence Hall, and, impelled by the occasion, commended to Providence, give shape to the feelings that had really been the feelings of my whole life.

AN OMEN OF SUCCESS

"Besides this, our friends there had provided magnificent flag of the country. They had written, I am sure, I was given the honor of raising it—I mean, it was, I was pleased that it was my place by the strength of my own feeble arm. When, according to the arrangement, the cord was pulled, it flashed gloriously to the wind, without an accident, the silken folds unfolding themselves in the manner I could not help hoping that there was, in the entire success of that beautiful occurrence, at least something of an omen of what is to come.

"Perhaps I may be mistaken, as I often have felt, in the whole of that proceeding I was a very humble participator, but I felt that there was, in the whole of this arrangement and circumstances, a kind of hand applied but a very small portion of my feeble strength in raising it, that there was in the hearts of the people who had arranged it and of I can have this belief, enough of the spirit of the Revolution to inspire, I think the flag of our country will yet be raised to the same end.

"My feelings this morning, of the prudence of Old Lincoln when this city. This was during the Sunday morning, I was in the city of Philadelphia, and the people of Philadelphia attend the services in Christ Church, appointed Bishop Simpson to act as minister of worship. Bishop Simpson was a Methodist."

On the end journey to Springfield, in April 1861, the train was stopped at Lancaster, Pa., and Lincoln was taken to the Lancaster County Court House in Independence Hall where more than 20,000 persons came to pay tribute to the martyred President.

The Philadelphia of Our Ancestors.

(CONTINUED FROM PRECEDING PAGE.)

Wistarina, a member of City Council, the sentinel in the Federalists for Congress in 1812, 1816.

Dr. Caspar Wistar married Miss Sarah Penrose Morris, daughter of Captain James and Phebe Jones Griffitts. Bergmann, who was born March 1, 1798, and died May 31, 1879, twenty years after his death, of her husband, which took place March 12, 1858. They children: Caspar Wistar, Jr., Sarah Griffitts, Elizabeth Morris, Phebe Jones, Montgomery and Frances. The oldest daughter married Dr. Thomas Dwight Ingersoll, the fourth Penrose, of the oldest Philadelphia family in the Penna—presented to The North American of April 26, 1908, Mrs. Pennington two surviving grandsons are Mrs. Griffitts, Mr. Phe—sweet, and Mrs. Robert W. Smith, Mrs. Pennington's daughter, Mrs. Robert W. Smith, daughter of Joseph Bonaparte Smith, and Frances Lewis, married Professor Robert E. Rogers, M. D. Mrs. Rogers, daughter of Mrs. Pennington, married Dr. Thomas Dwight Ingersoll, Jr., of Boston.

Mrs. Lewis, the second of the adult sons of Mr. Lewis, married Miss Sarah Griffitts, the daughter of a Quaker commercial family of Philadelphia, in the civic and non-public affairs. He was elected a member of the Select Council, in 1812, 1813, 1814, and was for a time treasurer of Girl Female Orphan Asylum, served as a manager of the Pennsylvania Hospital, and was a member of the Philadelphia Bar Association. He was a member of the Philadelphia Bar Association, of which he was president, and of children. Their descendants have not been largely identified with Philadelphia, through influential people wherever they have gone.

One of their grandsons, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Penrose parish, Lewistown, was for many years a member of the Philadelphia Bar Association, living in the South, finally in Louisiana, where he was president of Barrow Lewis's Berkeley Parish Natural Gas Company, and died in Philadelphia, in 1908, at the home of the latter in the Wife of Mrs. John S. Jenks, Woodbury, N.

Mrs. Lewis, Jr., the third of the adult sons of Mr. Lewis, born February 14, 1814, was the only other members of the Lewis family, extensively engaged in mercantile pursuits. As head of the firm of M. & E. N. Lewis—Mr. Nathan Lewis being a partner—he was a member of the Philadelphia Exchange for many years. In 1848, however, he withdrew from the firm and took up the business of Joseph Sloan, Jr., and was a member of the firm of Sloan & Lewis, were engaged in that and business from six years throughout their lives. They occupied their place in the Exchange, and were prominent in the affairs of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, in the Sloan and Lombard streets. After the change of family years, he removed to the old family mansion, Lewis, in the upper part of Philadelphia. This was in 1848. Of the original members of this old firm, a writer has said:

"They were old-fashioned merchants, men of the purest character, most unassuming manners and signal integrity."

Mordecai Lewis, Jr., Sloan, formerly engaged in business, was not beneficial of public interests or of the Philadelphia Exchange, of the Pennsylvania Hospital, of the Philadelphia Dispensary, and 1813-14, serving as a member of Select Council from 1811 to 1814, was one of the founders and the president of the society for opening sleighways for the poor, etc. Mr. Lewis married Miss Sarah Sloan, daughter of James and Sidney Sloan, the daughter of the eminent statesman, James Madison, and Dolley Madison, the wife of James Madison, who was a contemporary of the Lewis family, and died April 15, 1844, seven years before the death of her husband. Their children were Sidney Sloan, Mordecai Lewis, James Sloan, Sarah Madison, Charles Sloan, Alexander, Esther, Mary, Sidney Sloan married Mordecai Lewis, 3d, and died in infancy. The other daughters married and left issue.

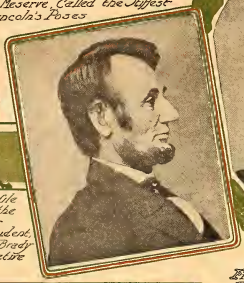
Mr. Lewis, 3d, the son, James Sloan Lewis, married Miss Sarah Madison Lewis, daughter of Mordecai Lewis, the only son who married, being Mordecai Lewis, 4th, and Charles Clymer Lewis, who married Miss Esther Lewis, daughter of Mordecai Lewis, Jr., and Sarah Sloan Lewis, and left issue, Mordecai Lewis, Martin S. Lewis, Daughter of Samuel Morris, Lewis, Esther Lewis, Sarah Lewis, Mary Lewis, Sidney Sloan Lewis, Sarah Madison Lewis, Mordecai Lewis, Mordecai Lewis, Mrs. Sidney Sloan Lewis, Mrs. Sarah Madison Lewis, Mrs. Mordecai Lewis, Mrs. Mary Lewis, Mrs. Esther Lewis, Mrs. Sarah Lewis, Mordecai Lewis, Mordecai Lewis, Mrs. Sidney Sloan Lewis, Mordecai Lewis, Mordecai Lewis, Mordecai

LINCOLN'S FACE PICTURED AND PAINTED

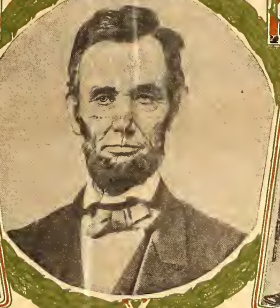
From a Brady Negative owned by F. H. Meserve, Called the Stiffest of Lincoln's Poses

This is Said to Have Been His Last Pose for the Camera

Said To Have Been Taken on the Sunday Before His Famous Gettysburg Address One of His Easiest Poses

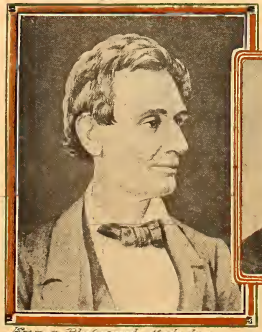


Profile of the War President from a Brady Negative

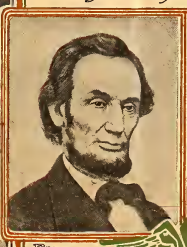


From a Photograph Made March 9 1864 Published in 1866 (From the Lambert Collection.) Considered by His Friends one of His Most Striking and Faithful Portraits

A Photograph that is not Familiar to the Public

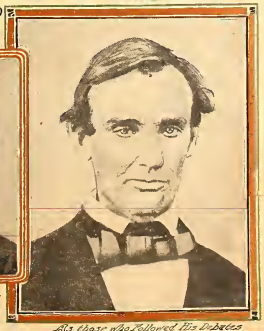


From a Photograph Made by Hesler, Chicago, in 1860



From the Portrait by William Marshall

One of Lincoln's Earliest Pictures, Taken in Springfield During the Campaign of 1858 Found Superimposed in the Desk Because of the Disordered Condition of the Nor From Collection of Mr. Lambert of Philadelphia



As Those Who Followed His Debates with Douglas Saw Him. From an Engraving Made by C. Jacobus Philadelphia October 1858